In the early 1900s, several countries went through revolutions seeking new ways of doing things and a better future for their people. China and Russia adopted communism, which aimed for a classless society where everyone owned and contributed to the means of production based on their abilities and needs. They opposed the capitalist system and private ownership of production, which they believed exploited the working class. Italy, on the other hand, embraced fascism, which promoted a powerful centralized state led by a strong leader who would foster nationalism, order, and discipline. Fascists rejected democracy, liberalism, and socialism, which they saw as weak and incapable of addressing the nation's needs. Mexico opted for a state-led economy that prioritized the country's sovereignty and heritage, opposing foreign intervention and exploitation of their natural resources. These ideologies reflected the evolving social, economic, and political realities of the time and would significantly impact history for years to come.
