What my thoughts for the upcoming formal paper three that I'll be researching would be Flannery O'Connor's "There Are No Good Men to Find" it's about the grandmother's family their death how Bailey the son felt about his mother and her southern views and why Bailey's wife never really spoke up about the decision to go a different route because the grandmother just wanted to indulge her grandchildren about a plantation that she claimed to have known about and wanted them to understand how that going there would be informative than rushing off to Florida I also want to understand why the grandmother saw the misfit as one of her babies before her death and where does the author want to take his readers with each of the titles that I will research on, and how did the author view the grandmother and the criminal or was it just his idea about senseless acts of random killing by the heartless misfit running from the law and taking the life of the innocent people along the way.
