

Janiya Burton

World Civilization

4/2/2023

Research and Writing Assignment

In an alternate history where the Inca Empire extended its rule for another 100 years, it is possible that they would have been able to ward off the Spanish invasion in 1632. This would have given the Inca Empire more time to strengthen its military and political infrastructure, as well as to develop more effective networks and hierarchies to maintain control over its vast territory. To secure the empire from European takeover, the Inca Empire would need to strengthen several aspects of its society. First and foremost, the military would need to be expanded and modernized. This would involve improving tactics, weapons, and training to better defend against the Spanish invaders. The Inca would need to be more vigilant in monitoring their borders and defending their territory from encroachment. Another important factor would be the development of effective networks and hierarchies to maintain control over the empire's vast territory. The Inca were known for their efficient road system, which could be expanded and improved to better connect the various regions of the empire. This would enable the government to more effectively communicate with and govern its subjects, as well as to quickly respond to any threats to the empire's security. The Inca would also need to strengthen their political institutions to better manage the challenges of governing such a large and diverse empire. This would require the development of more sophisticated administrative systems, as well as the training of a larger bureaucracy to manage the day-to-day affairs of the empire. Finally, the Inca would need to maintain their cultural identity and values in the face of European colonization. This would require a concerted effort to resist assimilation and to preserve their language, religion, and traditions. The Inca would need to be vigilant in protecting their cultural heritage and in educating future generations about their history and traditions. In conclusion, if the Inca Empire had extended its rule for another 100 years, it is possible that they would have been able to successfully ward off the Spanish invasion in 1632. However, this would require significant strengthening of the military, political, and cultural institutions of the empire, as well as the development of more effective networks and hierarchies to maintain control over its vast territory.