

Abide HIS 113 Week 11

In this alternate history, the Inca Empire would have extended its reign for another century, allowing it to become even more powerful and influential. This would ensure that the Spanish did not arrive until 1632. Over the next hundred years, the Inca Empire would have extended its reach even further, expanding to more distant parts of the continent. This would have helped them to gain more control over the resources and people in their area. This, in turn, would have allowed them to strengthen their networks and hierarchies. The Inca could have used this newfound power to increase the strength of their military forces. This could allow them to defend their borders better and ensure that any potential invaders would face stiff opposition. They would also manage to build an extensive network of roads, making it easier to move troops and resources quickly, further strengthening their ability to defend against an attack. The extended rule of the Inca Empire would allow them to develop and maintain a strong network of allies. This would enable them to build relationships with other indigenous people and with colonial powers. This may have been enough to ward off the Spanish invasion and secure the empire.
