

If the Inca Empire had continued to expand for another 100 years, the arrival of the Spanish in 1632 rather than 1532 would have changed the course of history significantly in my opinion. This would have provided the Inca Empire with more time to strengthen their political, social, and economic structures, as well as to develop successful networks and hierarchies.

The Inca Empire was one of the largest and most sophisticated civilizations in the pre-Columbian Americas, and already established a vast network of roads and a complex bureaucracy by the time the Spanish arrived. With another 100 years of expansion, the Inca Empire would have likely continued to expand and strengthened its power.

The Inca Empire's expansion would have required the development of successful networks and hierarchies to ensure that conquered territories were effectively governed and integrated into the empire. This would have involved the establishment of local elites who were loyal to the Inca rulers, as well as the construction of infrastructure such as roads, bridges, and irrigation systems to facilitate trade and communication.

To secure the empire from European takeover, the Inca rulers would have needed to strengthen their military and diplomatic capabilities. This would have involved the recruitment and training of more soldiers, as well as the establishment of alliances with neighboring tribes and states to counter any potential European aggression.

Additionally, the Inca rulers would have needed to support their economy and promote trade to ensure that their subjects had access to goods and resources. This would have required the development of new agricultural techniques, the expansion of mining operations, and the establishment of new trading routes with neighboring civilizations.

Overall, if the Inca Empire had continued to expand for another 100 years, it is possible that it would have been strong enough to ward off the Spanish invasion in 1632. The development of successful networks and hierarchies, as well as the strengthening of the military, diplomacy, and economy, would have been crucial in securing the empire from European takeover.
