

Jenna Gillespie

World Civilization

Lyndell O'Hara

4 March 2023

The Inca Empire had limited connections with the outside world and were at a disadvantage because of their location. With one of their centers of their empire being a city in the mountains their travel routes were narrow roads and bridges. Their territory was a strip of land along the North American pacific coast that was not designed to fight back against other nations' attack. With the geographical difficulties I think it would have been hard for the nation to survive. They had limited resources as well that would have kept them from ever defending themselves and weren't able to develop into an intelligent empire. They could have however used the geographical difficulties to their advantage to build up in the mountains and learn how to fight in the coastal waters. They could have also possibly expanded their empire to find locations easier to trade with, animals Thayer could use to their advantage and materials to build up their armies and empires.