Creed III

This is the third installment of the Creed film series, and is titled Creed III. Based on all of the events that go place, this movie shows a lot of leadership, trust, ownership, and camaraderie. The film's director and star, Michael B. Jordan, portrays Adonis Creed, a retired boxer who is regarded as the best of all time. Adonis runs into one of his old childhood friends who has just been released from prison following an incident in which they both were involved in which Adonis was confronted and nearly jumped and possibly killed. But Damian, his long ago childhood friend that has been locked up in jail for 18 years, was there to help him and save his life but as the cops came and pulled into the crime scene Damian was the one who was caught and Adonis ran away and got away from the cops and never seen again.

Damian's intelligence, grittiness, and success was the lead to what Adonis needed to be successful in the world of boxing, and becomes the greatest boxer of all time and runs into his old friend Damian at the diner and he still has that grittiness and hunger to become the boxing champion by staying in shape and still working up beside being locked away in jail for 18 years through the toughness and determination that it takes to get through a such bearable sentence as

18 years for such a good action that he done and taught for his friend Adonis. Despite Damian being a person with such hunger for greatness he's told he's not able to make a title shot to be the champion boxer but he feels as if he never got the chance to prove himself and what he is capable of and has to go through not as many tasks and trials and tribulations a regular contender would do because he's the only boxer available and Adonis gives him the opportunity to earn it and he earns it and feels as if he doesn't think he's beatable. This action from Damian erupts Adonis Creed also known as the breast boxer of all time to come out of retirement and earn his title back after retiring three years prior. Adonis had to train and get back into shape to compete back for his title and fight against his childhood friend who saved his life being one of the greatest if not the greatest fight of all time. This film shows the importance of having the proper people in your life and a lot of trust, belief, and hard work. It teaches you to treat others with respect and to give them the benefit of the doubt if they haven't quite earned it in some people's eyes. Being in the situation that Adonis was put in and him fleeing while his friend Damian was apprehended and served his full sentence is a very difficult situation to be in because it demonstrates the lack of loyalty and forgiving that one can have, and Damian believed that Adonis owed him something as a reward for what he did and saving his life whether it was in the boxing ring or outside the boxing ring, and always been that bigger person to look at for him. They always had a big brother and little brother connection going on, and it would come down and show who taught whom and how it was done. I feel as if it's a good movie to watch because it teaches you to surround yourself with the correct people that are there for you and are willing to put their life on the line and don't even think about the consequences that come with it.

As a way to cap off everything about the film, Adonis Creed gives his childhood friend Damian a chance to compete for the boxing champion title and become the world champion, demonstrating devotion and faith. Because of what Damian did right away to demonstrate that he is a real friend and that is what real friends do, it also demonstrates and teaches you who is truly your buddy and who isn't. It also demonstrates determination and commitment because Adonis' friend Damian still had the will to struggle and win his case before serving an 18-year sentence in prison.
