Research Paper

When I hear Crusades I first think about brave knights in shining armor. I think about lancing events and other exciting events from that time but that picture isn't what the reality was like. It's a romanticized picture shown in movies, TV shows, and books. I never really think about how could have really been. What messages do those images convey about the Crusades? What frame value or values seem to lie around such messages? What about images of contracts and contractual relationships?

When we look at images of the Crusades they often convey certain values like bravery, heroism, and loyalty. It shows how important religious devotion and belief is for the Crusaders. However, these images can also show some stereotypes and biases, such as the idea that the Western world is superior to other cultures and religions.

When we think about images of contracts and contractual relationships, they often convey the importance of trust, obligation, and fairness. A contract implies that both parties have agreed to certain terms and are bound to fulfill their obligations. Contracts are often seen as a cornerstone of modern society and are important for economic and social relationships.

Overall, it's really important to examine and question popular images of historical events because through that we can gain a more accurate understanding of the past. By recognizing the biases and stereotypes inherent in these images, we can challenge them and work towards creating a more just and equitable society.
