

Question 1- The Mongols built ships to attack Japan, but their boats encountered a Typhoon, and they were destroyed. They were successful at archery, breeding animals, and because Genghis Khan had so many wives and conquered so many places, he had a lot of children and even though his empire no longer remains his descendants are seemingly countless today. When the Empire still existed, they did a good job at keeping it safe and secure from enemies. They were also successful with trading routes.

Question 2- Something new that I learned about the Mongols is that they put people who had the plague in catapults and through them into other cities so that they would get the plague. Also, another reason why the Plague spread was because of the trading the Mongols did through their ship transportation to Europe and other places and also it spread because of rats and fleas that carried the disease. The Mongols provided trade, diversity, and tolerance which I thought was interesting. They also accepted the poor families to fight, and they didn't define them because of their rank and the rich got poorer, which I thought was interesting. It totally changed the norms of their society, or it changed the ranks.
