Summary

The twentieth century saw the end of the promises of modernity with the rapid process of decolonization and the growth of the Pentecostal movement and other contextual theologies. The three main branches of Christianity, The Eastern, the Roman Catholic, and the Protestant churches, were significantly impacted by the events of the twentieth century, each in their own way. The Eastern church was shaken by the Russian Revolution and the impact of Marxism, Roman Catholicism "faced the postmodern future with new vitality, but also suffering from strong inner "(92), and the Protestant movement saw obedience from the civil rights movement, the development of the ecumenical movement and the missionary movement. The demographic distribution of Christianity is the most notable recent change to the face of Christianity.
