

Alyson Palacios

April 16, 2023

PSY 253 OA

Professor Maret

4. Holders of the Enemies' understanding of the connection between theology and psychology reveal that antagonistic theories are founded on the idea that the two disciplines are incompatible. They're constant combatants who have never departed from a full-scale conflict. They declare themselves enemies, and truth must be defended against the enemy. The psychology of humans versus the theology of humans is seen as either/or by proponents of the Enemies model. Individuals who portray the relationship between science and religion using the Enemies model indicate methods that separate and isolate the components of a particular control from the elements in each other. People who adopt an Enemies mindset either overlook or ignore the Bible, the Book of God's Works, or both. Secular Combatants are those devoted to studying psychology and hold an outlook on life that is hostile to religious belief. They want to elevate the independent use of rational thought. Christians directly oppose this, whose viewpoint renders them wary of all human logic. Their ultimate goal is to defend religious authority and teachings from being corrupted by reason. The Spies model's practical goal of promoting humanity through every avenue possible is its telos. Individuals who interpret the connection between science and faith using the Spies simulation mainly use techniques to separate what they perceive as advantageous or helpful components of the faith from the convictions or actions they perceive to be related to mental health. In colonialists, Christianity is a living example of how God revealed to humanity what it is like to be an individual and how God's plan of redemption works. If it properly understands humanity's issues, psychology can help us comprehend what the Bible says. Psychological concepts or conclusions are usually met with a cursory acquittal by the colonists. The colonialist doesn't put much effort into understanding psychology and Christianity can communicate truth or how both fields can be used to get a greater awareness of human behavior and living. Rebuilders view psychologists as an entity that belonged to God but have been repeatedly ruled by those who don't recognize or serve God. They think that by embracing the prevailing secular principles found in contemporary psychological paradigms, believers run the risk of becoming complacent. They hold that psychology needs to be rebuilt while acknowledging Christ as Lord and building it upon the core tenets of Christianity regarding humanity, including the universe, fallen nature, meaning, and methods of change. According to Neutral Parties, theology, and psychology are separate fields with specific information, research methods, and conclusions. Both areas must be carefully separated to prevent one from spreading to the other.

Nevertheless, it's possible to draw comparisons between the results of psychology and theology. The Allies believe that God is the source of all reality and that everything was made for His glory and sustained by Him. Both fields display the truth about human beings and their performance, even though they are separate disciplines with distinct sources. Both of them are dependent.

5. Rebuilders appreciate empirical research more highly than Colonialists do, which is the main distinction between the two groups. Rebuilders, in contrast to Colonists, highly regard modern psychology yet consider it significantly shortened. They additionally present a competing review of its secular and modernist philosophical foundations. Colonialists must attempt to comprehend how psychology and Christianity may convey reality or how both can be combined to grasp better how people think and behave. Rebuilders appreciate empirical research more highly than Colonialists, which is the main distinction between the two groups. Rebuilders, in contrast to Colonists, highly regard modern psychology yet consider it significantly shortened. They additionally present a competing review of its secular and modernist philosophical foundations. Colonialists need to make more attempts to comprehend how psychology and Christianity may convey reality or how both can be combined to better grasp how people think and behave. Theology is the primary commitment of colonizers.

6. Colonialists follow a conservative or orthodox doctrinal framework of Christianity as opposed to a liberal, neo-orthodox, or more generally "religious" status, which distinguishes them from the resident form of the Spies framework. Colonialists value psychologists and spies can tell he works in the unworked territory. Psychological approaches or results that support or demonstrate colonialist theological views are sought after. They frequently choose to immerse themselves personally in communities of individuals who share their opinions instead of showing an intense dedication to or involvement with psychology. Foreign spies are not devout followers of any religion, but they are interested in learning about it to take advantage of its advantages. Despite their participation in a religious community, Domestic Spies are more devoted to that structure's psychological advantages than its fundamental theological tenets.