The African Burial Ground National Monument museum is located at 290 Broadway in Lower Manhattan, New York City. The museum was founded in 2006 to commemorate the lives of enslaved and free Africans who were buried at the site during the 17th and 18th centuries. Over 400 Africans' remains were discovered during an archaeological excavation in 1991, making it one of the largest and oldest African burial grounds in the United States. The memorial, which honors the lives of those buried at the site, is the museum's most visible exhibit. The memorial features inscriptions, quotes, and artwork that highlight the African diaspora and the history of the African burial ground in a circular design with a reflecting pool in the center. The exhibit is a powerful and moving tribute to African Americans' lives and contributions.

The museum staff represents a diverse group of people who are knowledgeable about the history of the African burial ground and the African American experience. The staff includes historians, archaeologists, and educators who are passionate about preserving and sharing the legacy of the African burial ground. However, it's important to note that the staff may not necessarily represent the specific group of people exhibited in the museum.

A visit to the African Burial Ground National Monument museum can be challenging for many individuals, I learned it forces me to confront the difficult history of slavery and its impact on African Americans. The museum does an excellent job of presenting this history in a respectful and informative manner, but it can still be emotionally challenging for some visitors. One thing visitors may learn is the resilience and perseverance of African Americans, who were able to build vibrant communities and contribute to American society despite the many obstacles they faced.
