Research and Writing: Three Languages Required

I am from Peru, a beautiful country located in South America; it is a must to understand and speak English in most schools completely, so we end up graduating knowing two languages, something that opens many doors and gives us many opportunities for jobs, studies, and life wise.

This assignment made me think a lot about how I had to create a nation that encompasses all of North America, meaning the United States, Canada, and Mexico, where understanding and speaking Spanish, English, and French is mandatory for every citizen. I believe that if that were actually a thing, it would have a profound impact on modern society in America and its frame values.

This nation language policy would promote linguistic inclusivity, recognizing the importance of language as an aspect of one's identity. By requiring English, Spanish, and French as required languages, this nation welcomes and values people from diverse linguistic backgrounds, promoting inclusivity and respect for linguistic diversity. It also encourages cultural exchange and understanding among its citizens. English, Spanish, and French are not just seen as means of communication but also as gateways to diverse cultures and histories. Citizens are encouraged to learn about and appreciate the cultural richness of North America, leading to greater intercultural understanding and cooperation. In addition, it would promote biliteracy and multiculturalism because citizens would have a deeper understanding and appreciation of multiple cultures, leading to a more inclusive and diverse society.
