

Jordan Mack

Professor O'Hara

HIS114

20 April 2023

It would be quite interesting for North America to be run by a single state that requires everyone to be trilingual. I honestly wish that America would require children to become at least bilingual. Personally I would love to be able to easily communicate with my peers here. I think that if the people of America specifically were forced to become trilingual some people would fight back. Specifically the people that swing more right because they would not like to be forced by the government. For an entire continent to be able to understand multiple other countries and their neighboring countries would be good. It would make communication much easier. I think working together and the USMCA would have easier communication. I think that I'm not completely sure if knowing a language would make the understanding of conflict easier or different. Maybe people could get their full points across. I think overall it would have a positive effect