

Postmodernism gained popularity after World War II, especially after 1968. Postmodern art combined high and low cultures using industrial materials and pop culture aspects. Postmodernism emerged as a response to modernism. Modernism was a period of change in literature, the arts, and culture, whereas postmodernism advanced technology. The difference between postmodernism and modernism is that modernists believe that people need to find the truth, have knowledge and philosophical understanding to know the reason for things existing. Free societies must apply some postmodernist principles, such as advancing technology and making life simpler and more comfortable. Postmodernism, however, has the potential to divide people of different races and cultural backgrounds. Because a postmodern civilization may think that there will never be human unity and that the purpose of repairing humanity does not exist, this divide might lead to conflicts across cultures.

Modernism and postmodernism are reactions to enlightenment conceptions of natural laws, which hold that morality cannot change as a result of human behavior. These values mostly alter in the United States due to a lack of knowledge on culture, ethnicity, and worldviews. Worldviews are diverse people's perspectives on the world. The ideals stated in these arguments are that humans cannot be together or separated because if they are separated, segregation would occur again.

Modernism and postmodernism are connected to worldview because everything depends on how a person sees the world and what decision a person wants to make and what they think would make the world a better place. Free societies do not need postmodernism because people have forgotten morals. Postmodernism believes that gender and sexuality are a matter of personal choice. They believe that there are no rules, people choose to do what pleases them and many other things. Which this goes against moral and principles of what is true.

Postmodernism is not the best ideal in a society that has too much freedom because too much freedom can lead to chaos.