The name of the film I chose to watch is “Freedom Writers,“ because the trailer was very captivating and made me curious to find out what happened to these precious lives. This film was worthwhile watching because it shows strategies to handle disruptive children, how children who are nurtured and cared for can be successful or enjoy a better life, how education is one of the keys to success, and how the teacher increasingly empowers her students by allowing them to make their voices heard, which makes a big difference in their lives. And in so doing, the students who were destined to become another negative statistic in society had their lives transformed by their educator, who went above and beyond to make this possible

This film was very moving and made me emotional to see the graphics of gun violence displayed right in front of the child sitting on her steps and how traumatizing that can be. Racism against the Latinos made them feel unappreciated and insecure walking the streets, and just like that, they had to run from a hail of bullets and the gangs in school. The students have to be looking over their shoulders every time. But at the end of every dark cloud, there is a silver lining, thanks to Miss G, as they called her. The students who came from broken homes, not knowing what it means to be loved and cared for, were able to experience substantial personal growth and transformation., which are some factors important for academic success.
