1. The Arthurian court in Gawain's story seems much more like the traditional image of it that we see in movies and books alike whereas the court in Geoffrey's writing is more toned down and is more like a loose gathering than a code.
2. The Norman invasion effected the heroic ideal much more in Gawain's story than Geoffrey's, many of the characters in Geoffrey's story, such as the Saxons, were lawless and barbaric in some ways, whereas Gawain's story is much more civil and modern due to the Norman invasion.
3. The Merlin in That Hideous Strength is much more of the fantastical sort and has more real magic than the Merlin in Geoffrey's writings, and Morgan Le Fay from Gawain's story seems to possess the same style of magic that Lewis wrote about
