1. We are meant to feel bad for the prisoners for what they are being put through. They don't have a reason to be in there yet they are still being treated horribly.

We should notice that for Dickens, pity is redemption. If we can just simply pity a character, then they are, from Dickens point of view, at least partially vindicated.

1. The doctor is doing so well because he finally feels free from his past life. He now can work in the prisons and help others making him stronger everyday.

We are finally seeing the doctor in an unshaken condition. Dickens is showing us that the doctor finally feels vindicated.

2. There is still the mystery of Darnay and what is going to happen to him. Also with Sydney Carton and what he will do in upcoming readings.

One obvious remaining mystery is the question of what Darnay told the doctor on the day of the wedding which caused him to relapse. There's also the question of why Sydney Carton has come to Paris and what his plan is.
