What did he fight for?

Martin Luther King Jr. fought for racial equality and against racial segregation through nonviolent activism, including marches for voting rights and desegregation, and led movements like the Montgomery bus boycott. His fight was for a nation where people would be judged "not by the color of their skin but by the content of their character," as stated in his famous "I Have a Dream" speech. He also advocated for economic justice and opposed the Vietnam War.

Why was so important for him to achieve his dream?

For Martin Luther King Jr., achieving his dream was vital to establish equality, justice, and an end to segregation for African Americans and all people. His dream was to create a society where individuals are judged by their character, not their skin color, and where the promises of liberty and opportunity in America were a reality for everyone. He pursued this dream through courageous, nonviolent action because he believed it was a matter of moral urgency and the key to realizing America's founding ideals.

What would you fight for?

I would raise my voice against racism, discrimination, and poverty, believing that love and nonviolence are the most powerful weapons to change the world. I would fight for a society where people are judged not by the color of their skin, but by the content of their character.

I would also defend the rights of the poor and oppressed, work to end violence and hatred, and promote unity among all races, cultures, and religions. My dream would be to see a world where freedom and justice roll down like waters, and every person can live with dignity, respect, and hope.
